Researchers conducted a multi-center, non-randomized, open-label study to evaluate the cognitive outcomes of yoga in cancer patients with psychiatric disorders. Dr. Mehdi Miri, associate professor in the department of psychiatry at Boston University School of Medicine, said his research team found yoga was helpful to patients and improved their stress and anxiety levels. Yoga, which is commonly practiced to improve health and manage stress, includes poses that mimic postures commonly found in real-life environments, such as sitting, standing, walking, and running. Certain poses include forward bends, inverted postures, arm balances, back bends, inversions, twists, and other stretches. The researchers reviewed the medical records of 108 cancer patients and found that 89 patients had no psychiatric disorders; another 14 patients had depression, 14 had anxiety, and three had a PTSD. Yoga participants were taught to do active poses such as standing poses, inversions, forward bends, and breathing exercises in a silent room. The duration of the yoga sessions were at least 20 minutes per day, five times a week, for three months. Before the first and last yoga sessions, the researchers conducted cognitive assessments to gauge how yoga improved cognition and mood. They found yoga participants had improved memory and concentration. The researchers also found that, compared to the control group, yoga participants had improved mood, reduced distress and anxiety, and improved sleep. This research was presented at the American Psychiatric Association's Annual Meeting in San Francisco. Current Psychiatry is the official journal of the American Psychiatric Association. I have an app that is currently in the iOS Beta Program, but it has a bug that was fixed in the final iOS 10.3.3 release. I don't want to distribute the app to users until I finalize all these steps. The bug is in a private framework and won't be released to the public. Is there a process for moving from the iOS 10.3.2 beta to the final iOS 10 09e8f5149f
