1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a paper feeder, and more particularly to a paper feeder used in an electronic printer, copier or the like. 2. Description of the Related Art In a conventional paper feeder, a paper tray is pulled out to a position of an printing device and then the paper tray is pushed forward by a latch member to position the paper for printing. The latch member is pushed in by a printing operation to a position for retaining the paper tray to prevent the paper tray from being pulled out to an upper side when the paper tray is ejected. However, a push-in force applied to the latch member at the time of printing is extremely great. Therefore, sufficient rigidity cannot be given to the latch member, and a slip may occur between the latch member and an upper cover of the paper feeder. In an attempt to overcome the above drawbacks, a latch member has been proposed in which an upper portion is provided with a projecting part for engagement with an upper cover so that the upper portion can be pushed in sufficiently even when the latch member does not have a sufficient rigidity (Japanese Patent No. 2856851). According to the proposal of Japanese Patent No. 2856851, the projection is coupled with the upper cover and the upper portion of the latch member is pressed by the projection, so that friction is increased between the projection and the upper cover, and between the projection and the latch member. However, in Japanese Patent No. 2856851, the upper cover and the latch member should be brought into contact with each other and a pushing force applied to the latch member at the time of printing should be transmitted to the latch member through the upper cover to increase friction. Accordingly, the latch member may deform due to the friction. As a result, the upper cover and the latch member may be damaged. netstandard2.0 0.9
