Stationary Waveguides that are tunable by using mechanical strain or electrical bias have been proposed in the past, and tuning of their resonance wavelength and band gap to visible wavelengths is already realized with either biasing of the semiconductor layer or tuning of the lattice constant of the channel. These band gap and resonance wavelength tunable waveguides are also important for many applications, such as on-chip optical interconnections, sensing, imaging, and data transfer in optical integrated circuits. What is needed is a method for making tunable wave 3e33713323
