Parathyroid hormone-related peptide (PTHrP) is an autocrine/paracrine mitogen and chemotactic factor for mesenchymal cells and is thus thought to play an important role in the pathogenesis of human vascular disease. We hypothesized that PTHrP is proteolytically cleaved by one or more peptidases in the extracellular matrix and that the cleavage products could have vasodilator and/or growth stimulatory effects. Human aortic smooth muscle cells were treated for 4 h with different concentrations of PTHrP in the presence or absence of lysosomal or trypsin-like proteases. The cleavage products were isolated using reversed-phase high-performance liquid chromatography and characterized by amino acid analysis and Edman degradation. The mitogenic effect of the products was evaluated in serumstarved human smooth muscle cells by means of cell counting and <sup>3</sup>H-thymidine incorporation. PTHrP was cleaved by two different peptidases. A 10-kDa fragment was generated by a trypsin-like peptidase which was active at the pH optimum of trypsin and was inhibited by thiol protease inhibitors. A 12-kDa fragment was generated by a
