The smart rail is a class of former express passenger trains which are now considered heritage railways. These trains are primarily run by railway preservation societies. Canada The longest preserved train in Canada is the Fort Dunvegan Express, part of the Royal Military College of Canada railway heritage fleet. France In France the concept of smart rail has been around since the 1970s.
Today, there are several converted and new-build tourist trains operating in France. The first railway to adopt the smart rail concept was the Lyon tramway, a suburban tramway in Lyon. The first trains operating as smart rails were the SNCF Class BB1A. They were retired in 1992 and replaced by the SNCF Class BB60 diesel railcars. In the 1990s, the Mâcon-Lyon TGV railway opened, carrying around 55000 passengers per day. The first single-car train was a diesel multiple unit BB60 class railcar, which was mainly used on suburban services during the early years of service until the B69 and BB70 units were introduced. The B69 and BB70 units were mainly used on services to the French countryside until the SNCF Class BB46 diesel railcars were introduced on the Méditerranée Line.
These were replaced by electric multiple units in the 2010s. Today, the concept is also used in the Saint-Étienne TGV railway, the high speed railway line connecting Paris and Lyon. The rolling stock is of two varieties, the SNCF Class BB46 trains operated on the Lyon-Saint-Étienne part of the line and the SNCF Class BB45 trains operated on the Saint-Étienne to Lyon part. The first SNCF Class BB46 trains entered service in 2010 and the last BB45 units entered service in 2016. The SNCF Class X 11000 Voltéo ( Voltéo meaning 'halo' in French ) is also a diesel railcar that is considered to be a smart rail. It is
