, I do not consider this a productive use of time. Subsequently I used my trusty SAME diesel 120D's search criteria and found the manufacturer for my smoke detector. I was able to find my dealer direct, which is great. If you know the manufacturer/brand of your products, you can do the same. Note, in Australia, the number of fire and electrical repairs a member of my household can get is limited. For example, the average car will repair 12 telephone numbers of the 5 year warranty. There are not enough specialists to meet that demand, even if all of us just decided to declare "I do not want a battery for my mobile phone". Prevention is the best cure, and the realisation that I do not want to spend my spare time repair or maintenanceing my battery will help my family to prevent such a tragedy in the future. It will also help the environment, at least. If I turn off the mobile phone and the charger, I do not have to worry about my batteries polluting our environment because they do not contain any. I also want to point out that this technique is not limited to phones, they may have a similar issue, but you need to read the manual to find out. You should always do that before spending your money on anything. Edit: you can also tune your laptop to maximize battery life. Check out my article about that here. It's okay to carry the phone when on the bus. There are a few disadvantages to it. The size of the handset is worse than most smartphones. The keypad is very small. The speakers are usually not very good quality for speech. When walking to the bus stop, you are still vulnerable to the elements. Battery charge can be cut off when walking out of the building. I would recommend having the phone at the side of the body (along with the PDA) and don't use the earphone as your primary source of communication. If we were still in the days of vinyl records, we would still be buying them, just because the legacy of vinyl was a way of life, and some people feel it deserves respect. However, don't for a minute think that the world is going to stop producing them. They will just be produced, and will stand the test of time, and we will marvel at how they developed from something so retro looking. The vinyl record did not fall out of favour
