Field of the Invention The present invention is generally related to a fuel supply unit (FSU) and a fuel injector assembly. 2. Description of the Related Art Many types of fuel injector assemblies have been used with internal combustion engines. The fuel injector assemblies may be disposed in the combustion chamber of the engine. A conventional fuel injector assembly includes a fuel injector and a valve needle assembly which is disposed between the fuel injector and the combustion chamber of the engine. The fuel injector is adapted to deliver fuel to the combustion chamber. The valve needle assembly is used to control the flow of fuel into the combustion chamber. The valve needle assembly includes a valve needle, a valve seat, a valve coil assembly, and a retainer. The valve coil assembly and the retainer are located between the valve needle and the valve seat. The retainer is used to retain the valve needle and the valve coil assembly. The valve needle is moved back and forth between a closed position and an open position to open and close the valve. A typical fuel injector assembly includes two types of springs to provide the biasing forces for the valve needle assembly. The first spring is an injection spring which biases the valve needle towards the closed position. The second spring is a float spring which biases the valve needle towards the open position. The size of the injection spring may be selected to provide a desired needle lift and a desired rate of needle movement towards the closed position. The size of the float spring may be selected to provide a desired needle lift and a desired rate of needle movement towards the open position. The operation of a typical fuel injector assembly may be improved by providing a spring of increased strength. More specifically, the selection of the spring
