Robotics News Google's Backflip drone shows it can take a long fall Wednesday, May 01, 2014 Most robots try to remain upright, by balancing on two or four small wheels. But what happens when they get hit from behind? Google's Backflip is designed to give canaries in coal mines and bot builders a laugh. Image courtesy of Google Researchers at Google and Berkeley have developed a relatively inexpensive airborne system called Backflip that can launch from a skateboard-size carrying case and reliably respond to a hard landing from any direction, toppling in the direction of its inertial force and completing as many as eight flips before it runs out of energy. Backflip is a proof-of-concept device that will expand into a suite of autonomous robots that will operate autonomously throughout the garden, according to the engineers who created Backflip in 2012. "To us a robot that can do a full flip is small enough to be useful in some way," says Vignesh Ramanathan, now an engineering professor at UC Berkeley, who was the chief robot builder at Google at the time this project started. The current generation of inspired DeGrassis student-built robots are generally designed to perform only one or two flips and use legs to return to the base. "At this point we've created a robot that can do a flip anywhere in the work space, no matter where it started from, as long as it has enough energy," Ramanathan says. "With Backflip we've created a giggle droid that can jump over all that. That has applications where you don't want to limit the robot's footprint in the work space." The first Backflip prototypes were
