The lower the icon, the more injured the character is. A magickal healer will heal 3 times as much as the normal healer. Dark WarriorRace with

What's new:

In November, 2010, "Mad" Jack [Leo Stanley] Manley died aged 92. It was his birthday yesterday. Today I want to tell you about his life and work. > Leo Stanley Manley always maintained that he was never before, and never since, such a load of garbage in his life as the "fatcat fops" of capitalism. Manley wasn't wealthy by 1950's standards, but he was in decent circumstances and fumed against the lot of them. His absolute refusal to play along with the game puzzled and disturbed his sometime friends. Often they tried to get him to play the game, and at first he would not. He would say that their game stank, and clearly it did. In the period up to the Broadside revolution, he invented a new form of writing, using his magically-selected keywords to construct strange artificial poems which seemed to grow in obvious organism-like patterns of words as they are laid down by the poem's protagonist on the page. As Manley liked to sing, his 1960 avowedly-corrupt fantasist song about the King of Collar City Empire and Modern Free Communism, became too frenetic and powerful for him to sing himself and he ended up having to give the song and the role of King to a friend, a se-amanate named Garret Maxwell. That act was his last foray into colliery song, but the Press actively promoted it, so much so that the young people could probably sing along with Garret Maxwell's song as a parody. It was a foreign scene to these young people, and the King's Beats seem like some weird alien creature, the way he is so nearly decapitated in the melody before his people realise he is really the king they want; it appears quite natural, quite normal. The action is in Collar City City, but what is being considered politically in the broadsheet papers, is that the site of any possible future revolutionary uprising, is in Potts Junction, a railway junction. Collar City City, the real place, is one of the world's biggest and most important coal mines. And the imaginary Collar City is a metaphor for what Manley thought the world would become if capitalism and the international bureaucracy continued. Manley had been reading the East European books - of Revoluton, of Solidarity - but had not seen them in the flesh in

Authorities in Saudi Arabia are seizing property tied to the controversial Muslim scholar and the founder of a group that has been widely condemned for its extremist views. The seizure came a few days before two talks in the U.S. that supporters of the late sheikh have said were canceled. A spokesman for the kingdom's religious police confirmed that Abdulaziz al-Foqha has been detained and that the ruling council of the Commission for the Promotion of Virtue and the Prevention of Vice was leading the investigation. That means police are also examining his properties — including a large palace on the outskirts of the capital, Riyadh, and land that he purchased about a decade ago in the ultra-conservative East province. Authorities did not elaborate on what authorities were looking for in the property. Supporters of Sheikh Nimr al-Nimr view the crackdown on his group, the Group of Muslim Scholars, as part of a crackdown on dissent, and say the sheikh was being unfairly targeted because of his beliefs. His supporters have also accused the government of rounding up his followers ahead of the king's upcoming trip to France to attend the opening of the new U.S. Embassy next month. The religious police has also come under fire for its alleged abusive actions toward dissidents. In 2014, the commission raided the home and offices of a Saudi blogger, Raif Badawi, who has received multiple prison sentences for insulting Islam and the kingdom's authorities. He was sentenced to 10 years in prison and 1,000 lashes, and Amnesty International and other human rights groups say he has been tortured. On Thursday, Crown Prince Mohammed bin Salman also announced that he is pushing to restructure the religious police. Hakim Almasmari, an associate of the sheikh and editor of the English language website Arabian Business, was speaking to reporters in the

For the past few years, Wendy's restaurants across the nation have been playing Subservient Chicken, a popular stop motion animation from Japanese director Sonny Chiba. The premise: a timid man knocks on everyone's door with a message to "rescue" their kidnapped wives. Over the years, various flavors of fried chicken have been associated with the movie, a running joke within the franchise. But this summer, the videos have taken on an entirely new meaning. Wendy's is using them to market their new "Famous Chicken" with an added "Facebook" aspect. The goal of this new marketing strategy is to help bring the customer's friends to the tables. In a press release on Friday, the company announced that they had partnered with Japanese artist Ai Yokota to develop the ad campaign. In the videos, fans of Wendy's are encouraged to upload a video featuring their grilled bird to the restaurant's website or Facebook page. Through this partnership, the ad hoc plays homage to those who have seen the original Subservient Chicken videos: "Facebook is a new frontier in online entertainment. We have made this avant-garde social media platform part of the hamburger experience." The artist has already worked with Subservient Chicken, creating an entire video centered around the concept of viral fame. With this new partnership, the media company hopes to eventually expand Wendy's audience with the famous chicken. This newest partnership already has 326,073 views at time of writing. While this is a small online platform, the trailer pretty much has the internet
