Such a visual inspection is carried out by measurement and analysis of the output of the sensor after temperature stabilization, typically in combination with an FFT analysis. So far, such a visual inspection of semiconductor components has been carried out predominantly directly after mounting on the carrier substrate. However, the methods known so far for the final inspection have the following disadvantages: Among others, a visual inspection is subject to personal interpretation and the resulting manual data can be falsified and/or are very time-consuming. One disadvantage is also the difficulty in inspecting very small components such as components having a chip area of less than 0.1 mm<sup>2</sup>. The methods described, however, are predominantly based on the idea of direct visual inspection of the components after completion of the assembly process and for the most part do not provide for visual inspection of the components while they are still on the carrier substrate. It is very important for the life of the component that the component is thoroughly cleaned after the surface processing such as the polishing of the surfaces is finished. For example, such a cleaning of the surface can be carried out with hot aqueous solutions. However, it is disadvantageous that the same component is subjected to such a cleaning twice, i.e. once before the surface processing and a second time after the surface processing has been completed. Finally, the heat treatment of the component can be carried out at various temperatures, which has to be monitored and controlled by manual or automatic methods. It is therefore desirable to provide a method for the inspection of components in the form of semiconductor components in such a way that a visual inspection of the components can be carried out while they are still on the substrate and the actual inspection of the component is carried out while still on the carrier substrate.Amino acid sequence of alpha-subunit of turkey (Meleagris gallopavo) acetylcholinesterase.
