

in addition to sample playback, all of the instrument samples included with studio one 4 have a midi input that can be used to control the virtual instrument directly, or midi input can be routed to the input signal path of the software. there are two ways of approaching the question. the first is to simply make a guitar virtual instrument and hope someone uses it. the other is to focus on a specific genre. in the case of the former, any of the many guitar virtual instrument plug-ins are good options. in the case of the latter, focus on an instrument such as the bouzouki, mandolin, or other instruments with a similar sound. this is what you have done, and you deserve high praise for it. the first part of the process is to select the most unique and appealing sound. if the product doesn't sound good, the instrument won't sound good. this is why we spend so much time getting the samples right, before we start building the virtual instrument. most people think of a virtual instrument as just a bunch of presets that sound really good. that's just one aspect of it. the other is the ability to play a sequence of notes at the correct pitch and in the correct rhythm, and to use the virtual instrument in a song with other instruments. addonfree.co.uk was great, but i'm not a fan of using their site to download the free samples. it's the first thing that comes to mind when i think "free samples." if you're not going to pay for the samples, you're going to have to rely on the samples being free. since the site doesn't offer a direct download link to the files, you're going to have to go searching for them. i'm always looking for free samples. i'm more concerned with the free samples being good quality than how many free samples i can get.
