the next step was to put this idea into the hands of users, and for mobile operators, with the development of gprs (general packet radio service), that happened in the early years of 2000's. this happened when the mobile network operators realised the huge savings to the businesses, consumers, and government revenue that result from people being able to access information online anytime and from anywhere. the next step was for the mobile operators to add this to their already established infrastructure with various devices (modems), the most important of which being the isdn router, which was also a backup to the existing network infrastructure. this same network infrastructure can now be used as a reliable connection base to allow private and business customers to access the internet. this network infrastructure is provided through networks and our connection devices. since each network is small, there is no need for extra connection devices in the same network. therefore, the isdn router can be the only connection device that connects to the internet. the devices that connect to this connection device are the mobile phones, in which the isdn router connects to the mobile networks, and the computers. this is known as an internet connection device. in addition, a second connection device for private and business customers is the wap (wireless access point), which is similar to a lan or local area network. in addition, it is a connection device that is used to connect to the internet through a wap enabled device such as mobile phones, personal computers, and modem equipped waps. 5ec8ef588b
