The new tools that you can see in Photoshop are to be expected with the introduction of the new API and the resources from the Android and Windows APIs to Native for GPU. Not only are the use cases with the “native” side such as building design apps on the Android or Windows platform, but also the API and its native graphics stack is superior to what ever software developer is able to dream. This is a great strategy to have and run slowly before diving into the next step based on what UI design has and may bring next for the app development process. With the native API further collaboration between the two products is being discussed with the introduction of the new interface and architecture behind new features in Photoshop and the Rangefinder lens, and the new DirectCompute 2D graphics stack that provides the new native GPU APIs for direct access to the new Web Assembly based GPU. This is a big deal for the developers since creating graphic apps on the mobile platform is being done with resources being pushed by the developers to, which is building a great amount of apps from the designers that were once only possible on the PC.
