You've probably heard that all your photos are made up of tiny, uniformly-sized squares of color called pixels. But, did you know that you can blend, copy, or move pixels within the same photo or even across multiple photos? The basic idea behind blending, copying, and moving pixels is the same: You can make one pixel from another. For example, if you copy a red pixel from one photo and paste it into a second photo, the red of the two images will be combined, creating a single, blended red. Or, if you copy the red of a flower into a blue photo, the red will be pasted onto the blue and the two images will be superimposed, creating a single, blended color. Moving pixels is a bit more complex, but essentially, it's the same idea just applied to multiple pixels.

Possibilities: Imagine the possibilities. With the Pixel Blending tool, you can modify pixels so that more than one photo is visible in your new, blended photograph.
