VersionThe invention relates to a device for the production of a laminated composite material comprising at least one fiber layer and at least one laminated material layer arranged thereon, and the invention also relates to a laminated composite material produced using the device. The invention moreover relates to a web transfer system for a device for the production of a laminated composite material, wherein the web transfer system has at least one web transfer roller system. The production of a laminated composite material comprising at least one fiber layer and at least one laminated material layer arranged thereon (e.g., a PTFE-laminated film) by means of a co-extrusion process is known in particular from DE 10 2008 006 883 A1, in which a fiber material is extruded and guided over a film, and the fiber material is then discharged and caused to solidify in the form of an at least partially liquid coating on the film. In the process, the two materials or the co-extruded materials are applied in the form of a two-component laminated composite material at a front edge side of a first web of thermoplastic material, which first web of thermoplastic material is subsequently widened and solidified for example by a drier and a cooler, and the composite material is transferred from the first web to a second web of thermoplastic material. The two-component laminated composite material can be used particularly well for extrusion coating an object, such as a gasket. The application of two-component laminates in the form of a composite material results in a large amount of waste. The two-component composite material is not only wetted over its entire surface, but is also partially torn out of the first web or the first transfer and is transferred to the second web or the second transfer. This is undesirable because wetted residues, which can partially re-solidify, can then lead to formation of pockets, pinholes or similar defects in the fiber material. DE 10 2005 061 495 A1 discloses a device for the production of a laminated composite material of a fiber material and a laminated material arranged there
