A safe space can be used in many different ways. It can be used to help a depressed person be at ease, as a cooling-down experience after a client reached the peak of exposure therapy. For anxious clients, a safe space can be an environment where they can imagine themselves in during challenging moments in every days life. A safe space is often a completely imaginary space, and therefore a very personal one (your childhood bedroom for instance). In order to personalize VR simulation comes with many different options to match the preferences of the client. The hue and saturation of the scenery can be changed, the time of day, volume options for sound effects or background music, it comes with three relaxing music tracks in different styles. Additionally, the therapist can make several animals appear around the client. These are deer, ducks, a cat, a puppy, and a horse. One of the most obvious use of the safespace is after a successful exposure therapy. The space allows the client to imagine himself in the environment of a previous exposure. Since the environment is completely imaginary, the client feels as if he is actually in the situation he experienced. The presence is much higher, and most of all, safe. Case Study: A client suffering from moderate to severe PTSD came to treatment. It was early in therapy, he had just started. He had many experiences in his past where he was attacked, verbally abused, and threatened. In these situations, he was afraid of being rejected. His fear of rejection had made him anxious and he had spent many years scared to talk to people. The worst things was that he was also afraid that these attacks might happen again, and this was his proof. He was not sure he would ever know peace and calm again. After a few weeks of therapy, he decided to spend some time in the vrreience safe space in the forest. He arrived in the forest, he felt safe and protected. He found himself a cozy tree, where he had some food and time to think about his past. He felt completely safe. He also sensed fear, but he didn't care. He had mastered this feeling, he knew how to take care of himself. When he had some free time, he wondered around in the nature. He enjoyed it. He found his own calm place, where he could sit, and feel protected. Over the course of one week, he brought himself to this calm place four times. The first week, the calm place was in the forest, but it came out of nowhere.

ZeeRobert Pattinson: 'Grown-up' Harry Potter fans will appreciate final Harry Potter movie By Salman Latif 19 May 2019 View of Hogwarts Castle from the set of The Crimes of Grindelwald There has been much doubt and speculation about when the final Harry Potter movie will finally hit the big screen. “Who is directing?” is a question that has been asked on and off all throughout the lead up to the conclusion of the wizarding series. So, die-hard “Harry Potter” fans can finally breathe easy. Director David Yates revealed he was returning to direct with the new movie titled “Fantastic Beasts: The Crimes of Grindelwald.” And, anyone who began early fandom of the series will understand why he has been entrusted with its finale. Yates’ departure from the Potter franchise at the tail end of the seventh installment led to many fans negatively remarking on him as far as the treatment of his films. But, it has been long time coming as he has been itching for his chance to take the baton to the final Potter movie. He took the job of directing “Harry Potter and the Sorcerer’s Stone” in 2001, after reportedly being offered a role in the main leading role. In Yates’ fourth film, Harry Potter and the Philosopher’s Stone, Harry has become a grown up, and the Wood family hasn’t become a party of one. Set in the UK, Harry is dealing with civil unrest due to various wizards and witches appearing on street corners. In that aspect, Potter became into a larger than life tale of a war between the magic-using community and non-magic users. This was a heroic struggle that saw many wizarding and non-wizarding lives being either lost or saved in the process. While Harry is an all-around good guy, the Wood family is still a very dysfunctional one. Seemingly haunted by Harry’s mysterious past, the kids are a misfit group. Leo, a Quidditch player, is looked down upon by his family. James, his older brother, is kind of unruly and thinks little of authority. James is the true voice of reason for the family, but Fred, George, and Lily’s infectious good humor keeps the boys’ perspectives on the world ever changing. However, Harry’s part of the family is still a
