What I want to do is read a file, get some information from it, create a page out of it and then inject some modifications into this page to add a table, then make it a new page, so that I can have a page like . . . . Now, from what I've read, this is probably difficult to do. I'm using PHP in IIS (Windows Server), I do a lot of image manipulation, and I guess that's the main problem. I know how to read images, write images, edit images, and that's it. Now, what I want to do is read a html page, get the info from it, get some information from it (let's say the first name and last name of a couple), create a new html page, inject a table, then make this whole thing new page. How can I do this? A: There is a module for that: mod_rewrite. The basic premise of mod_rewrite is that you send an URL to your server and it returns a different URL for you. If you open up your apache log, you will see the rules your server applies to the urls you send it. This may be all 0cc13bf012
