Bone marrow stromal cells (BMSC) possess many regenerative functions, but the source of the regenerative activity is a perplexing problem. We have addressed the question by testing two procedures that affect endogenous BMSC function: (1) Indirubin-3'-monoxime (3'-IM), a reversible inhibitor of cyclin-dependent kinases, and (2) BrdUrd, a thymidine analogue, that selectively kills progenitor cells. We investigated the effect of these treatments on the differentiation of 3T3 mouse fibroblasts into skeletal myoblasts. Treatment with 3'-IM before inducing differentiation prevented the differentiation process in a concentration-dependent manner. This effect was irreversible. Similar to 3'-IM, administration of BrdUrd during the induction of differentiation markedly reduced myotube formation. These results demonstrate that the differentiation of progenitor cells derived from a well-characterized, differentiated tissue is reversible when that tissue is exposed to 3'-IM or BrdUrd. The ability to eliminate progenitor cells by these means suggests that the lineage commitment of BMSC is determined during embryonic development.What is really going on in politics?
