CloneDVD 2.9.3.3 .Q: Incorporating an API into an Angular app I'm designing a web application which will heavily rely on an API which only comes in JSON format. The data will be consumed/stored by my application. I was thinking of doing the following: Use a REST API service (which will allow me to consume/modify data stored at the API) Use Angular for my presentation layer I then came across an article from 2014 that says Angular is not well-suited for consuming data from an

API. I believe the article states that Angular itself is not designed to provide RESTful services but rather it is a front-end framework. This seems a little confusing to me and am not quite sure how to proceed. I would also like to know if anyone can comment on the practicality of the approach I just presented. Are there any better ways to go about incorporating an API into an Angular application? A: I have found Angular very powerful for integrating an API into my app. This is what I have set up and it works well. Angular comes with a promise/observable support that makes it easy to bind data to UI elements. In my current project, I have a function called by a component that looks like this:

function getAllTabs(page) { return $http.get('./api/tabs').then(function (response) { return response.data; }); }
