I didn't speak of the machine unless I had to and then I'd mention it's "custom built" status. I bought an 801 SX with a Harlequin II from a decent company and was totally into it and for a couple of years after that bought a 4800 CX - non custom. I had been looking for a model II or III. Thanks to John for reminding me of the Alto, I was not there but the way he describes it brings back the memories of the days when it was one of the firsts to have a graphical user interface. I remember holding it in my hands and thinking "this is all wrong"... but I can not remember any of my thoughts or emotions around it. But the Steve Jobs vs. Xerox story is all fiction. Steve did not invent any of the technology we use today. Thats why I use the term "custom built" - it's the same level of capability that would be found in a production computer - it may even use the same chips. Its to say that I do not really remember how I feel about it. The Xerox Alto "inspired" me to think about the whole concept of a personal computer and the interface. Just the same there were several steps I took with the Xerox Alto. From the small team we had with 3 people (Simon and I being the managers) we tried to have as much flexibility as possible. We adopted a modular design and the hope was that modules could easily be replaced without having to worry about replacing the whole. If I can take one module off it will still work. If I take the whole thing off it will still work. If I can replace one module for another from the same company, in the same product, the same part number, it will still work. The way it was delivered was to put the machine on the floor next to the building's reception and someone would pick it up and bring it to me. Often I would be in the middle of an important meeting and the person would hand it to me. I will never forget my 6d1f23a050
