Recent efforts to communicate with astronauts, such as from Earth to the International Space Station (ISS) are also underway.[52] The future of space exploration, such as the single-step implementation of a manned mission to Mars, may result in an increased need to routinely communicate with the surface of Mars, and potentially habitation. The one-way communication device which has generated the most discussion and highest priority is a Mars-based rover. Such a rover would be parked at the landing site and might be capable of periodically broadcasting content to the world. There is a variety of different types of rover, from wheeled rovers to mover-less Martian rovers which "hover" in the air in order to decrease the amount of time needed to send a message.[53] Manned missions to other planets have not been suggested, though there is a strong possibility that individuals may travel to the moon in the future, as suggested by various sources, due to the position of the Moon and the planet Mars. Many private and government entities, such as NASA, have proposed manned missions to Mars over the years. All current and proposed projects are evaluated at JPL for feasibility and cost, and many are not funded. Examples of current and proposed missions to Mars are depicted in the table below. The first successful lander was the U.S. Viking program's Viking 1 Mars lander, which arrived at Mars on June 3, 1976. The Viking program was part of a history-making mission to Mars that culminated in the historic landing of Viking 1 at 12:35 p.m. EST, 12:35 p.m. PST on June 3, 1976 (May 29
